By and by he got down to business. It expects that he had had the extreme hims he had had the extreme hims of witnessing one of the Parisma explantors. He had not been instead, but had dropped in accidentally. It was deserted. A man standing close beside him had been hit by a flying bride. Of course, it might have hit himself just as conveniently. He had picked up the brick and had brought it home is his trunk. He appeared to extertain a high opinion of its delicacy and discretion. After speaking at length of the wise and wonderful work of Providence in preserving him, while permitting the other gentleman to sustain a compound fracture of the bridge of the nose, my new friend discussed the general subject of dynamiters. The stories that he told me were really dreadful; and, coming from an eyewitness, they impressed ins deeply.

"If the owner of it," he whispered, "to that fallow with the pointed whishers, I believe he is one of them. He came over in the steamer with me."

This conversation put me into such a frame of mind that when I left the train to house the steambout I imagined her to be freighted with nitro-gipeerine. But the question of a stateroum temperarily diverted my thought. At the carliest opportunity I sought the pursu's office and was told that hone was to be had. However, I put my name on the "watting list," in order to take my chance of getting a room which had been engaged by maft or whe but would not be taken. On this line these rooms are disposed of after dinner. The applicants gather about the purser's of the about 3 o'clock, and the names are called off from the list.

I was on hand at the proper time, but my name was about the purser's of the about 3 o'clock, and the names are called off from the list.

I was on hand at the proper time, but my name was about the first donen had any chance. A big uniformed man with a had voice stood inside the purser's window and called the name. He gave overy man two only, and if he did not appear his default was recorded. I understood this quickly, because the first firms or four men were in the her when the performance began and missed their apportunity.

Then an idea struck me, I would wait. here."

I did not wait to hear more. I pushed the door open with violence. The little brown bag was on the floor open. It contained a soiled collar, a whisk broom, a pint flask and a pack of cards.

At that moment there was a cautious knock at the door—not an ordinary knock, but one with a certain measured cadence, as of a signal. Something told me what was coming. I felt that it was what my wife would call a judgment. While I was trying to decide whether to admit the visitor or to slide gently out of the stateroom window and swim for the Connecticut coast, the door (which I had not looked) slowly opened, and the head of the man with the pointed beard was thrust cautiously in. The remainder of his physical being followed soon, and I perceived that he carried the small handbag.

"You are John Brown," said he, in a solemn tone, and he made a peculiar sign with one finger. My nerves were in such a condition that I actually imitated that sign, though I would have given seven hundred dollars not to do it.

"Ah," said he, as if relieved. "Well, here's the stuff," and he indicated the handbag.

"Take it away," I gasped.

"No weakening now," he replied, sternly, "or you are lost. It is harmless if you handle it properly. Lift the bag thus"—accompanying his words with appropriate gestures—"and it is safe. But if you wish to blow the vessel into fragments, grasp the bag in any other manner than that which I have shown Mrs. Carlisle had with her most of the season two lovely Kentucky girls, Miss Virginia Bail Helm and Miss Mattie Thompson. I crept softly to the stateroom door. I listened, and the sound of laughter came from within.

"Jimmie, old boy, it was the alickest thing I ever did," said the voice of the man with the pointed beard. "I saw him get filled up with dynamite stories on the train; I heard the reference to my bag; I knew that he got this state-room by passing himself off for some-body elsa. I was something like sixtleth on the waiting list, and we should have had to sleep on the floor sure if I hadn't seared that long, queer thing out of here."

seemed easier to remove myself. I withdrew from the stateroom, keeping as far from the bag as possible, and climbed to the steamer's hurricane deck where I made my bed in the long boat with a tarpaulin for my coverlid and an iron grappling for my pillow. However, even such comforts as those did not induce sleep. I expected to be blown up, and my only hope was that the longboat would come down keel first, so that I might eventually be found in a fair state of preservation.

Morning came in the course of six or eight years, and I perceived that we were approaching New York. I had never thought much of the town, but I was glad to see it again after having abandoned hope. I feit like the ship-wrecked sailor who was washed ashore at Asbury Park, N. J., and who afterward denied, in a letter to Mr. Bradley, that he had ever and that he would rather have been drowned. Pretty, brown haired, brown eyed little Courtney Walthall, of Mississippi, has been written about and flattered so much that it's a wonder her curly head hasn't been turned. The same might be said of Lucille and Corinne Blackburn, Newer ones who have not been paragraphed so often are Miss Brice, of Ohio, and Miss Mary Vilas, second daughter of Senator Vilas, of Wisconsin.

Miss Brice is rather plump, but of good figure, and has thick brown hair combed quite plainly back, exposing a well shaped forehead. She is bright and witty, and talks remarkably well. that he had ever said that he would rather have been drowned.

Soon I could see on my right hand the great city where my home was waiting me; and, on my left. Blackwell's island, where the penitentiary was waiting for the man with the pointed beard. And the thought of my home reminded me that I had left a bundle containing eight yards of dress goods in my state-room. How could I face my wife without it? A friend in Boston had bought it to match something for her, and there was no such thing as a duplicate in New York. I thought of my wife and the little brown handbag in the stateroom, and I decided to run such risks as were involved in the bag. The envious may look upon this as a choice of evils; I call it herests.
